- 1 Which sociologist argued the family performs four universal functions: reproduction, sexual regulation, economic support and education?

- ☐ A) Talcott Parsons
☐ B) George Murdock
☐ C) Louis Althusser
☐ D) Zygmunt Bauman

(Total for Question 1 is 1 mark)

- 2 Define what Parsons meant by 'primary socialisation' in the context of the family and industrial society.

(Total for Question 2 is 2 marks)

- 3 Identify and explain two functions Murdock claimed the family performs for society, referring to Murdock's theoretical context.

(Total for Question 3 is 4 marks)

- 4 Item A: A short extract on family roles. Researchers interviewed workers in a medium-sized town. Several respondents said that after industrialisation more families had one person working in paid employment and the other focusing on home life, which respondents linked to the need for stable, geographically mobile wage earners. Using Item A and your own knowledge, identify and explain two ways Parsons linked family structure to industrial society.

(Total for Question 4 is 4 marks)

- 5 Describe one aspect of Parsons's 'warm bath' theory about the family and adult personalities in the context of postindustrial stress.

(Total for Question 5 is 3 marks)

6 Define Engels' argument about the family and the emergence of private property in the context of historical materialism.

(Total for Question 6 is 2 marks)

7 Identify and explain two Marxist views about the functions of the family in capitalist societies, naming the Marxist theorists where appropriate.

(Total for Question 7 is 4 marks)

8 Item B: Zaretsky and the family as a support for capitalism. Item B: An extract summarises Zaretsky's claim that the family offers emotional support to workers and so helps maintain a stable, exploitable workforce, and that the family is also a unit of consumption, buying goods produced under capitalism. Using Item B and your own knowledge, explain one way Zaretsky argues the family supports capitalist production.

(Total for Question 8 is 4 marks)

9 Describe Parsons's 'functional fit' theory linking family structure to the needs of modern industrial society, with reference to family type.

(Total for Question 9 is 4 marks)

10 State one criticism of Parsons's theory that the nuclear family best fits industrial society.

(Total for Question 10 is 2 marks)

11 Identify and explain two key differences between Murdock's functionalist account of the family's functions and Engels' Marxist account linking the family to private property.

(Total for Question 11 is 4 marks)

12 Define Althusser's concept of the family as an Ideological State Apparatus in the context of how ideology is transmitted.

(Total for Question 12 is 2 marks)

13 State one strength of a Marxist analysis of the family in explaining links between family structure and capitalism.

(Total for Question 13 is 2 marks)

14 Describe one limitation of Murdock's view of the family as performing universal functions, with reference to modern empirical evidence or critiques.

(Total for Question 14 is 3 marks)

- 15 Essay question: Using your knowledge of Marxist theories (for example Engels, Zaretsky, Althusser) and non-Marxist critiques (for example functionalism, feminism, interactionism), discuss how far sociologists would agree that the family serves the interests of capitalism. Make reasoned judgements and reach a supported conclusion.

Discuss how far sociologists would agree that the family serves the interests of capitalism, using relevant Marxist and non-Marxist perspectives.

Question 1

- B1 B (George Murdock)
- Answer: B

Question 2

- B1 identifies that primary socialisation is the process where young children learn basic norms and values
- B1 development, e.g. this learning is carried out mainly within the family during early childhood and prepares children for adult roles in industrial society
- Answer: Primary socialisation is the process by which young children learn basic norms and values; Parsons saw this happening mainly within the family during early childhood, preparing children for adult roles in industrial society.

Question 3

- B1 identifies one function, e.g. reproduction
- B1 explains how it fits Murdock's idea, e.g. reproduction provides new members to sustain society
- B1 identifies a second function, e.g. economic support
- B1 explains how it fits Murdock's idea, e.g. the family provides food, shelter and financial support for members
- Answer: Example: reproduction, which provides new members needed to maintain society; and economic support, where the family supplies food, shelter and care for dependent members.

Question 4

- B1 identifies one Parsons link, e.g. the move to a nuclear family fits industrial societies requiring geographical mobility
- B1 explains why this link matters, e.g. smaller, geographically mobile nuclear families are easier to move for work and support an isolated wage-earner
- B1 identifies a second Parsons link, e.g. segregated conjugal roles with instrumental and expressive roles
- B1 explains why this link matters, e.g. the instrumental role focuses on paid work and economic support while the expressive role provides emotional care and socialisation, stabilising adult personalities
- Answer: Parsons argued industrial society favours nuclear families because they are more geographically mobile, fitting the need for workers to move for jobs; he also argued a division into instrumental and expressive roles helps the family stabilise adults and provide efficient socialisation for children.

Question 5

- B1 identifies the warm bath idea: the family soothes adults after work
- B1 development, e.g. the family's emotional support helps restore adults, making them effective at work
- B1 further development or example, e.g. affectionate family relationships reduce stress and help social stability
- Answer: The warm bath idea is that the family soothes adults after the stresses of work; the emotional support and affection provided by family life helps restore and stabilise adult personalities so people can return to work refreshed and maintain social order.

Question 6

- B1 identifies Engels' claim that the monogamous nuclear family developed alongside private property to ensure inheritance of wealth
- B1 development, e.g. Engels argued this benefitted men and helped reproduce class inequality across generations
- Answer: Engels argued that the monogamous nuclear family emerged with private property so men could pass on wealth to legitimate heirs; this change served to reproduce class inequalities and benefit the bourgeoisie.

Question 7

- B1 identifies one Marxist view, e.g. the family serves capitalism by guaranteeing inheritance of private property (Engels)
- B1 explains the link, e.g. monogamy and the nuclear family help ensure clear lines of descent and property transmission
- B1 identifies a second Marxist view, e.g. the family acts as a unit of consumption and ideological support (Zaretsky, Althusser)
- B1 explains the link, e.g. families buy goods the capitalist system produces and socialise children into accepting capitalist values, cushioning the system from challenge
- Answer: Marxist views include Engels' claim that the family developed to protect inheritance of private property, reproducing class inequality, and Zaretsky/Althusser's view that the family functions as a unit of consumption and ideological apparatus, socialising members into accepting capitalist norms.

Question 8

- B1 identifies a correct way, e.g. the family provides emotional support which helps reproduce labour power
- B1 explains using Item B, e.g. emotional support helps workers cope with exploitation and return to work the next day
- B1 adds a linked point, e.g. the family also absorbs frustrations that might otherwise be turned against capitalism
- B1 development from own knowledge, e.g. the family as a unit of consumption helps sustain demand for capitalist-produced goods
- Answer: Zaretsky argues the family supports capitalist production by providing emotional support that restores workers after exploitation, allowing them to keep working, and by acting as a unit of consumption that buys goods, sustaining capitalist markets.

Question 9

- B1 identifies the core idea that family structure fits the needs of the wider society, e.g. nuclear family fits industrial society
- B1 development, e.g. extended families suited pre-industrial societies with stable local economies
- B1 further development, e.g. industrial societies need geographically mobile, socially flexible nuclear families
- B1 example or consequence, e.g. the nuclear family supports a mobile labour force and clear role divisions
- Answer: Parsons' functional fit theory claims family structure changes to fit society's needs: extended families fit pre-industrial, locally rooted economies, while industrial society demands geographically mobile nuclear families with clear role divisions, which better support a mobile labour force.

Question 10

- B1 identifies a recognised criticism, e.g. it is deterministic and ignores family diversity
- B1 brief development, e.g. critics argue many family types coexist and the nuclear family is not universally dominant
- Answer: A criticism is that Parsons' view is deterministic and ignores diversity, since many different family types coexist and the nuclear family is not universally dominant even in industrial societies.

Question 11

- B1 identifies a first difference, e.g. Murdock sees universal positive functions while Engels sees the family as reproducing class inequality
- B1 explains the difference, e.g. Murdock presents functions as beneficial to all societies, Engels sees the family as historically specific and serving ruling class interests
- B1 identifies a second difference, e.g. Murdock focuses on social order and stability, Engels focuses on inheritance and ownership
- B1 explains the difference, e.g. Murdock's approach is functionalist and consensual, Engels is conflict-oriented and emphasises economic causes
- Answer: Murdock presents the family as performing universal, generally beneficial functions supporting social order, while Engels argues the family historically developed to protect private property and reproduce class inequalities; Murdock is consensual and functionalist, Engels is conflict-based and economic in focus.

Question 12

- B1 identifies ISA idea: institutions like the family transmit ideology that supports the state and ruling class
- B1 development, e.g. the family socialises children into acceptance of existing class structures and capitalist relations
- Answer: Althusser argued the family is an Ideological State Apparatus because it helps transmit ruling-class ideology, socialising children to accept existing class structures and capitalist relations.

Question 13

- B1 identifies a genuine strength, e.g. highlights how the family can reproduce class inequality and economic relations across generations
- B1 brief development, e.g. this draws attention to power and ownership rather than assuming family roles are natural
- Answer: A strength is that Marxist analysis highlights how the family can reproduce class inequality and economic relations across generations, focusing on power and ownership rather than treating family roles as natural.

Question 14

- B1 identifies a limitation, e.g. empirical evidence of diverse family structures that do not perform all four functions
- B1 development, e.g. same-sex families, single-parent families or kin networks challenge the idea of a single universal family type
- B1 further development or example, e.g. some functions may be performed by other institutions like schools or the state
- Answer: A limitation is that Murdock's claim of universal functions is undermined by evidence of diverse family forms that do not perform all four functions, such as single-parent or same-sex families, and by the fact that schools and the state also perform functions like education.

Question 15

- Level 1 (1-3): Basic statements about the family and capitalism with limited use of sociological ideas. Little or no development or evaluation. Conclusions, if present, are unsupported.
- Level 2 (4-6): Some relevant sociological knowledge and description of Marxist claims that the family benefits capitalism. Limited engagement with alternative perspectives and limited evaluation. Conclusion may be simplistic.
- Level 3 (7-9): Clear explanation of Marxist views that the family serves capitalist interests, with some developed counter-arguments from functionalist and feminist perspectives. Good use of sociological evidence and concepts, and an attempt at evaluation leading to a reasoned conclusion.
- Level 4 (10-12): Detailed and balanced answer: well-developed Marxist analysis (Engels, Zaretsky, Althusser) explaining how the family reproduces labour power, ideology and private property, combined with substantial, developed counter-arguments from functionalism, feminism and interactionism. Evaluation addresses strengths and limitations of Marxist accounts and reaches a supported, qualified judgement.
- Indicative content:
 - Marxist agreement: Engels argued the family developed to protect private property and ensure inheritance, serving the bourgeoisie.
 - Marxist agreement: Zaretsky argued the family reproduces labour power, provides emotional support that stabilises workers and acts as a unit of consumption, sustaining capitalism.
 - Marxist agreement: Althusser saw the family as an Ideological State Apparatus, socialising children into acceptance of capitalist relations and legitimising inequality.
 - Support for Marxism: empirical examples where families transmit wealth and class advantage, consumer culture targeted at families, roles that reproduce gendered labour power.
 - Functionalist counter-argument: Parsons and Murdock claim the family performs necessary universal functions for social order and is not simply an instrument of capitalist class interests.
 - Feminist critique: some feminists accept Marxist points about class but argue patriarchy within the family benefits men as well as capitalists, so class is not the only power structure reproduced.
 - Interactionist critique: focus on family as site of action and meaning, suggesting families can resist or reinterpret capitalist ideology rather than simply reproduce it.
 - Empirical and methodological limitations of Marxism: tends to be deterministic and economically reductionist, may overstate the unity of family interests and underplay diversity of family experience.
 - Evaluation could conclude that Marxist theories offer powerful insights into links between family and capitalism, especially over inheritance and ideology, but that they need to be combined with other perspectives to account for gender, agency and family diversity. On balance a qualified agreement is plausible, with reservations.
